 [First two paragraphs: “Capitalism was a failure in March of 1933. The financial system was bankrupt, industry was in disarray, agriculture was in revolt, and for many, gainful employment was a distant memory. Poverty was rife: one third of the nation was ill housed, ill fed and ill clothed. Aspects of the current situation resonate with the Hoover years. Parallels can be drawn with the 1930’s, but the situation is not as dire, nor is American capitalism as discredited, as in March of 1933. The economy is floundering, (however) it is not a disaster...”]

 [Complete text of article: “The argument we have advanced is that the employment system of the advanced (rich) capitalist countries like the United States is undergoing rapid changes. The employment structure for which the Social Security Act of 1935 (was created) is not disappearing but it is withering away. Instead of (a) structure whose core consists of workers who are employed by one company for a major part of their working life, we now have an employment system in which an employee will change jobs and companies a number of times over the interval between school and retirement. The change is from being a dependent of a company to being an independent worker. Such independence can make like more interesting, but there is a transfer of risk and uncertainty from the “companies” to the “individuals” and their families. Fortunately the changes in the employment structure are being made in a very rich country. In the United States, we have institutions in place, which if appropriately used will make the emerging employment structure benefaction, not an affliction. Perhaps the most important of these institutions is the system of Junior or Community Colleges, which became well nigh universal throughout the land in the epoch of the Great Society. Community Colleges are non-pretentious institutions whose aim is to serve a community. They make adult or continuing education a real possibility. In an employment structure which make employees more like independent contractors than dependents, each employee needs to recognize that their current employment may well be transitory and within a relatively short period of time you may need to have a different set of skills in order to earn a living.”]
